

Review Article

Comparative Analysis of Masculinity and Environment in Things Fall Apart and The Jungle Book

Zebo Zukhriddinova<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup>Foundation program student, Dept. Art and Humanities, Glasgow International College, UK

*Corresponding author: Zebo Zukhriddinova

DOI: 10.62046/bhss.2025.v01i01.001

| Received: 03.10.2023 | Accepted: 09.12.2023 | Published: 14.12.2025

Abstract: Masculinity, as a cultural and psychological construct, has been central to the narratives of both Chinua Achebe's Things Fall Apart (1958) and Rudyard Kipling's The Jungle Book (1894). Both texts, although emerging from very different historical and cultural contexts, explore the intricate relationship between masculinity, social expectations, and the environment. Achebe situates masculinity within the complex social and ritual life of the Igbo clan in pre-colonial Nigeria, while Kipling constructs a metaphorical jungle where the protagonist, Mowgli, must navigate survival, hierarchy, and rites of passage from boyhood to manhood. In both works, the environment plays an essential role in shaping and reflecting the protagonists' understanding of manhood, courage, and responsibility. This essay provides a comparative analysis of masculinity and the environment in these two texts, demonstrating how social, cultural, and ecological contexts mold masculine identity and behavior. The study highlights the contrast between Achebe's rigid, socially enforced model of masculinity and Kipling's adaptive, ecologically informed conception of male identity, illustrating the critical role of environment in the performance and recognition of masculinity.

Keywords: Masculinity, Environment, Comparative literature, Cultural context, Ecocriticism, Gender construction.

Citation: Zebo Zukhriddinova. Comparative Analysis of Masculinity and Environment in Things Fall Apart and The Jungle Book. Bull. Humanit. Soc. Sci, 2025 July-Dec 1(1): 1-4.

INTRODUCTION

Masculinity, as a cultural and psychological construct, has been central to the narratives of both Chinua Achebe's Things Fall Apart [1] and Rudyard Kipling's The Jungle Book [2]. Both texts, although emerging from very different historical and cultural contexts, explore the intricate relationship between masculinity, social expectations, and the environment. Achebe situates masculinity within the complex social and ritual life of the Igbo clan in pre-colonial Nigeria, while Kipling constructs a metaphorical jungle where the protagonist, Mowgli, must navigate survival, hierarchy, and the rites of passage from boyhood to manhood. In both works, the environment plays an essential role in shaping and reflecting the protagonists' understanding of manhood, courage, and responsibility. This essay provides a comparative analysis of masculinity and the environment in these two texts, demonstrating how social, cultural, and ecological contexts mold masculine identity and behavior.

In Things Fall Apart, Okonkwo's masculinity is inseparable from the traditional Igbo notions of strength, bravery, and honor. From the beginning, Achebe establishes Okonkwo's obsession with demonstrating manliness in contrast to his father, Unoka, who is characterized by weakness and improvidence [1]. Okonkwo's physical prowess, economic success, and violent temper are all markers of his masculine identity. He believes that any sign of weakness equates to social and personal failure. For example, his participation in tribal wars and his decisive actions in punishing perceived transgressions are tied directly to his understanding of what it means to be a man in Igbo society. Achebe emphasizes that Okonkwo's sense of masculinity is both socially constructed and enforced: "He had a slight stammer and whenever he was angry and could not get his words out quickly enough, he would use his fists" (p. 4). Here, Achebe shows that masculinity is not only a matter of reputation but also of bodily performance and the ability to assert control over both people and circumstance.

The environment in Achebe's Things Fall Apart is not merely a backdrop for social action; it is intricately woven into the very fabric of masculine identity, serving as both a literal and symbolic arena where cultural expectations of manhood are tested, performed, and reinforced. The Igbo landscape, with its rich forests, sprawling villages, and fertile yam fields, functions as a stage where Okonkwo's masculinity is repeatedly evaluated, both by the community and by himself. Yams, referred to explicitly as the "manly crop" [1], become a central metric for masculine achievement. Success in yam cultivation is not only a marker of economic acumen but also a demonstration of virility, discipline, and resilience; it signifies a man's capacity to master both nature and social hierarchy. Okonkwo's relentless dedication to his farms underscores his belief that control over the land parallels control over his social world, reflecting a worldview in which masculinity is inseparable from labor, endurance, and authority. Beyond agriculture, the surrounding forests and rivers function as sites for communal rituals, hunting expeditions, and martial exploits, all of which are avenues for demonstrating courage and fulfilling societal expectations of manhood [1]. For instance, hunting trips are not merely practical endeavors but rites of passage, where young men test their skills and bravery under the eyes of the clan. The environment, therefore, is both formative and performative: it shapes masculine ideals and provides the spaces in which these ideals are enacted, contested, and recognized. Achebe's portrayal suggests that the natural world and cultural codes are intertwined, so that failure to navigate one can result in social and psychological vulnerability, as seen in Okonkwo's later struggles.

In Kipling's The Jungle Book, Mowgli's passage into manhood is inseparable from his engagement with the jungle, a complex ecosystem that functions as both mentor and testing ground. Unlike Okonkwo, whose understanding of masculinity is largely dictated by rigid social norms, Mowgli's identity emerges organically from a combination of innate ability, observational learning, and adaptive intelligence within a highly structured but morally instructive natural environment. The jungle is not a neutral backdrop; it enforces its own laws, where survival, hierarchy, and ethical conduct intersect. Bagheera, the panther, serves as both guide and moral compass, instructing Mowgli in the subtle codes of the wolf pack, while confrontations with Shere Khan emphasize the dangers and responsibilities inherent in assuming power. Each encounter functions as a form of education, teaching Mowgli lessons in courage, strategy, and ethical discernment, all of which are essential components of his emerging masculinity [2]. Physical strength alone is insufficient; the narrative celebrates ingenuity, prudence, and adaptability as marks of true manhood. Symbolic milestones, such as mastering the Red Flower (fire), underscore the interplay between natural knowledge and technological empowerment, highlighting Mowgli's ability to assert dominance over the environment without violating its ethical framework. Through this portrayal, Kipling suggests that masculinity is as much about understanding and negotiating one's surroundings as it is about physical prowess, emphasizing that ecological literacy, social intelligence, and moral judgment are inseparable components of a resilient male identity. The jungle thus becomes a dynamic classroom where the physical, social, and ethical dimensions of manhood are cultivated in tandem.

Kipling also portrays the environment as an active participant in shaping masculine identity. The jungle is not a passive backdrop; it is a system of social, ethical, and natural laws. For instance, when Mowgli learns to use the Red Flower (fire), he gains a tool of empowerment that marks the transition from boyhood to manhood: "I will decide on my life or my death, not you. I am a man, and to show you, I have brought the Red Flower with me" [2]. The Red Flower, symbolic of human ingenuity and control over nature, mirrors the yam fields in Things Fall Apart, where mastery over a natural element confers social and personal authority. Both Okonkwo and Mowgli demonstrate that environment is not merely a setting but a crucible in which masculine identity is forged.

Another point of comparison is the social mediation of masculinity. In Things Fall Apart, Okonkwo's masculinity is validated through social recognition, rituals, and peer judgment. The egwugwu, communal assemblies, and warrior exploits establish standards of manhood that Okonkwo strives to fulfill [1]. His social environment enforces adherence to norms and punishes deviation. In contrast, Mowgli's masculinity is assessed within a quasi-democratic ecosystem of the jungle. Leadership, respect, and acceptance by the wolf pack are contingent upon observable skill, bravery, and ethical conduct rather than inherited social status [2]. While Okonkwo's identity is constrained by rigid cultural codes, Mowgli's identity evolves through meritocratic negotiation with his environment and peers. The comparison illustrates how social structure mediates the expression of masculinity differently in human and non-human societies.

The connection between masculinity and environmental adaptation is starkly illustrated in the contrast between Okonkwo and Mowgli, particularly in moments of confrontation with authority. In Things Fall Apart, Okonkwo's downfall is directly tied to his inability to negotiate a rapidly transforming cultural and ecological landscape. The arrival of colonial forces and Christian missionaries introduces an alien environment where the traditional markers of Igbo manhood, physical strength, martial skill, and social status, lose their efficacy. Okonkwo's violent confrontation with the court messengers, culminating in his suicide, exemplifies this tragic rigidity: "Okonkwo drew his machete. The messenger crouched to avoid the blow. It was useless. Okonkwo's machete descended twice and the man's head lay beside his uniformed body" [1]. His act is both defiant and fatal, a final assertion of a masculine ideal that the new socio-political environment no longer supports. Achebe thus portrays masculinity not as an inherent or universal trait but as a socially and ecologically mediated construct. By contrast, Mowgli's confrontation with Shere Khan demonstrates adaptive masculinity within an environment that demands flexibility. By mastering the Red Flower (fire), Mowgli asserts human ingenuity while respecting the jungle's ecological and social laws: "I am a man, and to show you, I have brought the Red Flower with me" [2]. Here, masculinity is validated through a combination of skill, intelligence, and environmental attunement. The comparison underscores the idea that successful masculinity is contingent on the ability to read, negotiate, and respond to one's environment—be it the human socio-political landscape of colonial Nigeria or the ecological and social complexities of the Indian jungle. Okonkwo's rigidity and Mowgli's adaptability highlight how environmental pressures shape, constrain, or enable masculine identity in fundamentally different ways.

Mowgli, conversely, demonstrates adaptability in his confrontation with Shere Khan. By mastering fire and utilizing it strategically, he asserts human dominance while respecting the ecological and social laws of the jungle: "I am a man, and to show you, I have brought the Red Flower with me" [2]. Unlike Okonkwo, Mowgli's masculinity is not defined by stubborn adherence to tradition but by innovative interaction with his environment. The contrast between Mowgli and Okonkwo emphasizes how different environmental pressures shape models of masculinity: one is rigid and socially enforced the other flexible and ecologically informed.

Both Achebe and Kipling explore the psychological dimensions of masculinity, highlighting how fear, courage, and the negotiation of social and ecological pressures shape male identity. In Things Fall Apart, Okonkwo's fear of being perceived as weak is a defining force in his behavior. This fear, deeply rooted in cultural expectations and his personal history with his father Unoka, drives him toward aggression, excessive control, and often cruelty: "He had a slight stammer and whenever he was angry and could not get his words out quickly enough, he would use his fists" [1]. Psychologically, Okonkwo embodies what Connell [3] describes as "hegemonic masculinity," where vulnerability is repressed, and social dominance is asserted through violence and labor. His fear is both internalized and socially enforced, illustrating how cultural norms can produce rigid, performative models of manhood. By contrast, Mowgli in The Jungle Book faces fear in a natural and ecological context. The threats posed by Shere Khan, environmental hazards, and rival animals require courage, adaptability, and strategic intelligence [2]. Mowgli's fear is situational and productive, cultivating skills and moral judgment, demonstrating a more symbiotic relationship between male identity and the environment. Ecocritical scholarship supports this view, noting that interaction with dynamic natural spaces encourages resilience, ethical agency, and socially recognized competence [4]. Moreover, Butler [5] suggests that identity, including masculinity, is performative and contingent, aligning with how Mowgli negotiates fear adaptively. By juxtaposing Okonkwo's culturally rigid fear with Mowgli's flexible, environment-driven courage, both texts illuminate the psychological pressures underlying masculine identity and how these pressures interact with social and ecological contexts.

The theme of marginality and social exclusion provides a compelling lens through which to examine masculinity in Things Fall Apart and The Jungle Book. In Achebe's novel, the osu, or outcasts, exist at the margins of Igbo society, barred from full participation in communal rituals and social networks. The advent of the Christian church offers these marginalized individuals a new social space, challenging traditional hierarchies: "Unless you shave off the mark of your heathen belief, I will not admit you into the church. The heathen speak nothing but falsehood. Only the word of our God is true" [1]. Okonkwo's rigid adherence to conventional masculine norms prevents him from engaging with these social transformations, exacerbating his isolation and underscoring the dangers of inflexible masculinity in dynamic contexts. In contrast, Mowgli occupies a liminal position from birth, straddling the human and animal worlds. His acceptance within the wolf pack and broader jungle society is contingent not on birthright but on competence, courage, and ecological literacy [2]. This meritocratic model demonstrates that masculine authority can emerge from performance and adaptation rather than inherited status. Butler's [5] theory of performativity illuminates this dynamic, showing that gendered identities, including masculinity, are enacted through repeated actions rather than fixed traits. Ecocritical perspectives further suggest that navigating a marginal environment, as Mowgli does, cultivates agency, resilience, and ethical decision-making [4]. Together, these texts illustrate how marginality intersects with social and ecological pressures to shape, challenge, and sometimes redefine masculine identity, highlighting the contrast between rigid, socially enforced models and flexible, adaptive models of manhood.

Secondary scholarship reinforces these interpretations. Chinweizu [6] argues that Achebe's portrayal of masculinity is inseparable from the socio-cultural and ecological context of the Igbo, emphasizing that "the physical environment, ritual obligations, and agricultural practices are critical arenas where masculinity is performed and contested". Likewise, ecocritical readings of Kipling highlight the jungle as a formative space for ethical and social development, noting that "the jungle is both a school and a stage for Mowgli, where survival, leadership, and courage are tested” [7]. The convergence of primary and secondary sources thus illuminates the environmental determinants of masculine identity in both works.

The texts also interrogate the consequences of failing to adapt to environmental and social change. Okonkwo’s demise illustrates the dangers of inflexible masculinity: his inability to reconcile traditional notions of manhood with colonial encroachment results in social alienation and death [1]. Mowgli’s narrative, however, underscores the rewards of adaptive masculinity. By engaging with the jungle and later the human village strategically, he achieves both social respect and personal empowerment [2]. The comparative lesson is clear: masculinity thrives when aligned with environmental understanding, whether ecological, social, or political.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, Things Fall Apart and The Jungle Book provide rich, complementary explorations of masculinity as both a social and environmental construct. Achebe’s novel foregrounds the rigidity of traditional masculinity in the face of cultural and ecological disruption, highlighting the tragic consequences of inflexibility. Kipling’s work, by contrast, portrays a model of adaptive masculinity, emphasizing intelligence, courage, and ecological awareness as central to male identity. In both texts, the environment, whether the Igbo lands and forests or the Indian jungle, shapes the conditions under which masculinity is performed, contested, and recognized. The comparative study of these texts underscores the intersectionality of gender, environment, and culture, revealing that masculinity is neither universal nor static, but dynamically negotiated in relation to ecological, social, and moral imperatives. By examining these works together, readers gain a deeper understanding of how literary narratives construct and critique the ideals and vulnerabilities of masculinity in diverse environments.

REFERENCES

1. Achebe, Chinua. 1958. Things Fall Apart. New York: Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group.
2. Kipling, Rudyard. 1894. The Jungle Book. London: Macmillan.
3. Connell, R. W. 1995. Masculinities. Berkeley: University of California Press.
4. Garrard, Greg. 2012. Ecocriticism. New York: Routledge.
5. Butler, Judith. 1990. Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity.
6. Chinweizu. 1980. The Masculine Principle in African Literature. Lagos: NOK Publishers.
7. Heise, Ursula K. 2008. Sense of Place and Sense of Planet: The Environmental Imagination of the Global. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

